

Sidney Goldfarb

TO MAKE THEM MONUMENTAL

There are only so many people that you can talk to,
and they aren't here.

It took you years to uncover them
and then they disappear.
And then you disappear.

Then you're in a certain place with people all around you, interested, friendly people in the way that a tribe of natives might be interested and friendly but you're completely alone:
out the window
isn't the building he works in, she doesn't do her laundry down the street.

You know where they are:
They're there in a marble remembrance of the gods that once returned eternally but never comes back any more.

Winter is a condition,
spring is spring,
and women are beautiful,
momentarily.
No season holds them and promises them in a particular movement of the earth.
No hand comes to make them
monumental out of stone.
And you forget
the outline of their faces, and you can't taste
their breasts in your mouth, and their smell is an incense that always escapes you, and you don't remember exactly their eyes of eternity in that attic, in that desert, in that bar that no one ever went into again.

Only the form of them can find you, straddling a crack on any abandoned stretch to drag an accident of words out of your mouth so someone will tow you into town, so something will bring them back.

THE MAN YOU JUST PASSED

No clear origin.
 No obvious direction.
 Thick-thighed, big-bellied,
 Heavy-buttocked, hairy, Squat, a working man,
 A man who hasn't worked,
 Head set directly into chest, Upright. Upright looking Skyward, looking earthward, Averting eyes, burning to look Deeply, to reach out to you In the pride of his youth.

Upright, arms uncomfortable
 At his sides, gesturing, Grunting out of a cave,
 Ice-driven into shelter, Planting the alluvial basins, Words in his mouth, desirous Of love.

Desirous
 Of knowledge, knowing Nothing of himself, or next To nothing, some damned
 To wander in search, damned
 To knowledge of his wandering, No clear origin, no obvious Direction, a book
 Of myths and laws, a flood,
 A kingdom, a flood,
 Bound up and freed

And bound again, walking, Feet planted in fear, planting Nothing, facing murder.

Then out of the dead continent,
And the gods dead, and his own kind Taking new gods, he taking none, Foreseeing destruction,
Talking, eating, eating well, Eating with his eyes Over his shoulder, taking Shelter in cities,
Walking the streets
Of accidental cities, no Clear origin, no obvious Direction, lover
Of women, lover
Of children, deserter
Of both, bound up
And freed and bound again, Walking, arms uncomfortable
At his sides, feet Planted in fear, planting
Nothing, facing murder,
In a country of murderers,
I reach out to you,
I'm the man you just passed,
There were words in my mouth.

SPEECH, FOR INSTANCE

or the wind in the imported, invisible paradise trees.
Something roasting in the oven.
The suffocation of an isolate Cape Cod House.
A plunge into the Atlantic at the end of a bitter March.
Everything
has its effect:
Sleep.
Breakfast.
Conversation.
The revolution
which will come
in one form,
the revolution
which will come in another, we recognize, I recognize the wind and food and shelter most after a plunge into the icy ocean. The sun warm, the dune warm, the beach chill and damp under my feet, the ocean bitter cold so that the body loses consciousness for a moment, breath is hard to find, you emerge, screaming, in pain, out of the water, out of the coldest water, a girl is coming out of the water behind me, also screaming, you don't have to know who Aphrodite is any more, you can see her, she's a girl coming out of the sea, her mouth is open, her breasts shake and glisten, in one form or another things happen, and you know that the world is only to be enjoyed, and what gives access to one must give access to all, and only then will isolation

become joyous to us, a matter of our own choosing.
All this is written
in one form or another.
Everything
has its effect:
speech, for instance, or a girl
coming out of the sea.

FROM THESE BITTER WORDS

I am only
myself
and I come from nowhere.

Of course you don't know me.

I was born in a town of little importance
near a city that was once a major city but is now
of little importance.

And my name?

My name
was stolen from a dead man in a country
I have never seen.

It follows
my first name
like a ghost,
a lost ghost,
going nowhere
to be born.

My parents were like all parents:
loving,
ridiculous,
and destructive.

Even so I have certain memories.
I remember
the men without fingers
the men
without eyes
the men
without tongues who came out of the factories at five o'clock
to buy the newspaper
from me
or a pack of cigarettes.
You don't
know them.
You will never know them.
I am only
Myself
and I no longer
know them.

But I
remember them.
Even in the centers of the major cities of the world where the discussions go on day and night and the bright-eyed young men
make emphatic decisive gestures with delicately manicured hands,
I remember them.
I remember them.
The follow me
like my name.
When I see them
I know my life
is stolen from them, the living and the dead
as your life is stolen from these bitter words.

DON'T BE AFRAID

Don't be afraid of me
Don't be afraid of what I say Neither of us has been here for long We shall both go away soon and leave little behind us No one leaves more than a little So listen while you have me before you And I will listen to you Don't be afraid of me
I'm coming from nowhere in particular I'm not going anywhere in particular I like to lower myself into a cool pond on a hot day in Maine perhaps as you do or Colorado I've been in both places and don't elevate one over the other If it's summer that's the season I like best Don't be afraid
I like hard work if I'm building something I believe in an engine or a house or a fence against the wind Other times I'm content to loaf I'm loafing right now in New York it's springtime I like the angles of the buildings and the odors that assault my nose I haven't seen anything you couldn't see
Are you looking at me or at my body or is there any difference While you're deciding remember not to be afraid of me Remember that they are arranged so that certain things are visible
You go down the main street and see the stores and a few of the fine houses
This is what towns look like from the highway But cut to the right or left by the railroad station maybe
And you will find the inevitable tin shacks

And sometimes an entire family living under a bridge
And you are afraid because you are not of these people Not in your lifetime
Don't be afraid of me
I was born in Peabody, Massachusetts
If you went through it on the highway it would be like passing me on the street
You would see a certain deception Inside there would be Greeks and Portuguese and endless tanneries
You would see a shopping center motels and a horizon of ranch homes
Away from it under a sagging stairway that leads to the porch of a three-story wooden frame house someone would be beating someone else to death
Don't be afraid of me
I'm inside my body You're inside your body We're animals standing upright on the surface of the earth
I was a roofer once and I liked the work Before that I was a plumber and I liked that too I liked the way molten lead flowed from one form into another These things were as pleasant as swimming naked on a hot day in Maine
The future is invisible but it's coming up soon
Don't be afraid
Don't be afraid of me
Don't be afraid of what I say
It's your turn now

